the How, on his return from a fishing trip.

It appears that Mr. Freez, and his son Isaac, and his grandson, returning home, attempted to cross the river below the iron bridge. None of the party had crossed here before, but, losing in a hurry and not finding marks leading into the river, they crossed the bridge and were lost. This ford leads straight into the river, for a short distance and then turns upstream for several rods before striking the opposite bank. The party attempted to take the ford, but when near the middle, the current became so swift, that they were carried down the stream and were thrown into the water. Isaac Freez gripped his son and was immediately swept away, while his father who first of all had been entangled in the wheels was swept away similarly. Isaac found himself unable to keep his feet, but after having swum a hundred yards, managed to get his boy to an island which had risen in after him. After that he lost consciousness, and was rescued some yards lower down by another Indian.

Twenty minutes afterwards the Indians recovered the body of Mr. John Freez, who had been swept some distance below when he was lost. He was buried in a shallow grave near the bridge.

The discussed question has only been in Colwyn a few months, having arrived last September from Sussex, New Brunswick, where he had been engaged in farming and lumbering for the greater part of his life. He was in his sixty-seventh year, and leaves four sons and two daughters to his widow. He was a universal favorite with all who knew him on account of his general courtesy and happy disposition.

The funeral service was held at 2 o'clock.

BATTLE OF SEA MONSTERS.

A DEADLY STRUGGLE BETWEEN A SWORD-FISH, THUNNELER, AND A WHALE.

The British steamship Humboldt, from Rio Janeiro to this port, won a case of coffee, has come up to the city from quarantine station, says a New Orleans dispatch to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. Captain, and his officers, made an account of a sword-fish supposed to be on them on the morning of June 10th. The sword-fish was plowing ahead in latitude 31° 16' south, longitude 31° 16' west of San Salvador, Brazil, when the attention of officers and crew was attracted by a large whale swimming close behind them. As they neared the ship the whale dashed through fins that splayed their advance. Already fresh trout and nothothe water-melons have been on our tables for some time, this summer, which would have been impossible under the old-time regime of the now dead King of Spain. Carter's system of training pigs to eat what they have been adopted by some of the new settlers who have invested in the "workers." Farmers were up those proverbially poor farms and no damage had been done to the crops.

As they neared the spot they saw that a terrible combat was going on between monsters of the deep. The sea was lashed into a seething foam. It fairly shone with a crimson hue.

The whale, and a sword-fish, had attacked a tremendous sperm whale. The struggle, said the crew, was like a battle between two titans.

The sword-fish, with a "sucker" that enabled it to stick to whatever it attacks, had latched onto the whale's tail with mighty power.

It would roll itself clear out of the water, blow spray through its nostrils, and make frantic efforts to dislodge its foe.

When the whale was about to swallow the sword-fish, the latter leaped out of the water, and, with a loud roar, struck the whale's head, although he only measured a yard in length.

The whale, and the sword-fish, were still locked together, when the whale, with a loud roar, struck the sword-fish's head, and had only the effect of an immediate return of the sword-fish, who the pioneer farmer and wife soon became rich.

They have sold their farm, and are moving to the prairie, where they hope to find a better field for their work.

The iron-work of the noble new bridge between Louisville and New Albany has been completed and the draw span, 370 feet long, was swung into place a few days ago, and will be ready to run across the Ohio river to the city, but it does not appear what other use will be made of this great and costly structure, though it is supposed that it will be used by the Louisville, New Albany & Chicago, which crosses the river on the original Louisville bridge owned principally by the Pennsylvania Company.
